

How did the British popular music industry react to the outbreak of war in 2014?

John Mullen

► To cite this version:

John Mullen. How did the British popular music industry react to the outbreak of war in 2014?. Congrès European Society for the Study of English, 2014, Kosice, Slovakia. hal-02503566

HAL Id: hal-02503566

<https://hal-normandie-univ.archives-ouvertes.fr/hal-02503566>

Submitted on 10 Mar 2020

HAL is a multi-disciplinary open access archive for the deposit and dissemination of scientific research documents, whether they are published or not. The documents may come from teaching and research institutions in France or abroad, or from public or private research centers.

L'archive ouverte pluridisciplinaire HAL, est destinée au dépôt et à la diffusion de documents scientifiques de niveau recherche, publiés ou non, émanant des établissements d'enseignement et de recherche français ou étrangers, des laboratoires publics ou privés.

How did the British popular music industry react to the outbreak of war in 2014?

John Mullen, Université Paris-Est Créteil

ESSE conference, August 2014, Kosice, Slovakia.

The war dawned on a powerful music industry which was determined to continue to show its respectability through voluble patriotism, but within which its different actors also scrambled to position themselves in the new context, in order to ensure that the war would not harm them commercially and might even improve their profitability. Whether artistes or theatre chains, songwriters or record companies, each actor was obliged to take into account this new factor which added itself to the multiple existing constraints of their professions. This paper will evaluate these constraints and the weight of the new context, and will also attempt to judge the alleged jingoism of music halls of the time, by examining it within a much wider corpus of the songs of 1914, of which the vast majority did not speak of the war.

THE INDUSTRY

The industry in 1914 is made up of a series of actors each with their own interests and priorities. Theatre managers and owners, and the owners of chains of theatres are, by this time, in charge of tightly run businesses expecting to show a healthy profit, and sometimes quoted on the stock market. The owners and managers are also in the process of fully integrating local elites. This is no doubt why they are so obsessed with ‘respectability’ and the elimination of ‘vulgarity’: their profession has a bad reputation to shake off. The arrival of the war provokes fears of the collapse of takings (the theatres in France are shut down by the government for several months at the start of the war). This will lead to particular measures to safeguard profitability. And from the very beginning of the conflict, being part of the elite means being enthusiastically in favour of British victory, and the theatre owners will join in somewhat jingoistic patriotic expression, and in particular encourage recruitment speeches in the theatres themselves (whereas the Church of England, for example, though it supported the war, refused to have recruiting speeches given from the pulpit).

The singers, constantly on tour and endlessly negotiating with theatres for a better salary or more prominent billing, and quite often living a hand to mouth existence have also both an economic and a political response to the war. From an economic point of view, they are very worried that audience numbers will collapse and theatres will close, resulting in a vast increase in unemployment in an industry where life is already precarious. Their trade union, the Variety Artistes' Federation, negotiates with the organizations of owners and managers a sharing scheme in which artistes accept reduced wages on a pro rata basis to takings, the hope being that in this way fewer theatres will close. This agreement will in fact only last a few months: the expected collapse in takings does not happen, and indeed within six months box office takings are higher than they were before the war. For the remaining years of the war, the variety theatres will be full, a phenomenon encouraged by soldiers on leave with money to spend (since although their wages were low, there was little to spend them on in France), and also by rising incomes for working class people due to full employment and, in particular, increased opportunities for women.

Singers and songwriters could also have an opportunistic approach to the arrival of war. The music hall singer felt themselves more showmen than auteurs, so adding a war verse to an existing favourite song to keep it up to date was a common reaction to the coming of the war (just as in the years before the war they might add a verse mocking suffragettes, whatever their personal position on women voting, if they thought it would help their song become a hit). Closely in tune with what working class audiences want to sing along to, they will be, perhaps surprisingly, careful not to propose songs about hating or killing Germans.

Musicians, stage hands and dancers, although less likely to be constantly touring and more likely to be attached to one particular venue, followed a parallel trajectory to singers in their economic response to the outbreak of war.

Politically, the priority of singers, as ever, was to propose to audiences consensual songs, since sing-along was at the centre of the appeal of music hall, and sing-along can only be built around the consensual or the ambiguous. This is why the repertoire at the very beginning of the war was often loudly patriotic and included a large number of recruitment songs. It is also the reason that the recruitment songs disappear almost completely after the first few months of the war (in the Greatest Hits collection of 1915, published by Francis and Day, the biggest of the music publishers, there is not a single recruitment song, although outside the theatres, the recruitment campaign was at its height (its eventual failure led to the introduction of compulsion in the spring of 1916).

The REPERTOIRE

Questions of repertoire

ON STAGE IN 1914 5 from a collection of playbills from the argyle theatre in Birkenhead

BEFORE THE OUTBREAK OF WAR : example of a day's programme :

Mann And Franks-Singing Comedy Act

Brown's Royal Bioscope

Lipinski's 40 Dog Comedians, 'A Wonderful Animal Pantomime'

Harry Thornton and Emma Wagner-American Vocalist and Instrumental Act

Bros. Curran-Boxing Comedians

Cooke-Juggling Joker

The O'Mahonys-Irish Songs

George Gilby-Lancashire Comedian

Frederick Sylvester and Company, World's Smallest Acrobats

Brown's Royal Bioscope-'The Curse of War'

2 Coleys, Fay and Fay-American Quartette-Novel Negro Comedy
Song and Dance

Hickey's Comedy Circus Including the Comical Unridable Mule

Bertram Banks-Mimicry of Children

Alice Maude-Comedienne and Male Impersonator

Bert La Mont the Singing Comedian and Cowboys

17 AUG no patriotic content

14 Sep no patriotic content

21 sep ditto

28 sep : latest war pictures is first sign on the playbillsthat there is a war on!

AFTER THE OUTBREAK OF WAR

Duncan and Godfrey-Coster Delineators

Alick Lauder-Scottish Character Comedian

Lily Leonhard-Soprano Vocalist

The Vedras-Comic Acrobats

Walter Stanley-Tyneside Comedian

Brown's Royal Bioscope

Arthur Aiston-Song Character Impersonator

Palette's Novel Performing Dogs

Arthur C. Clifton-Versatile Comedian

Brown's Royal Bioscope-Latest War Pictures

Yamamoto and Koyoshi-Japanese Equilibrists

George Graves-Comedian in 'Koffo of Bond Street'

Nora Delany-'Liverpool Pantomime Idol'

The Four Curtis's-Dancing Act

Syd Moorhouse-Novelty Vocal Act
 Tom E. Finglass-'The Original Cowboy Coon'
 Robb Wilton-Confidential Comedian
 Alexandre and Hughes-Musical Comedians
 Edna Payne-Violinist

Enthusiastic war songs

Be a soldier, be a man !
 Belgium put the Kibosh up the Kaiser
 Boys in Khaki Boys in blue
 England thy name
 For the honour of dear old England
 Good Luck, Little French Soldier Man!
 Hands Off, Germany!
 I'd like to be a hero, too !
 Jolly good luck to the girl who loves a soldier !
 March on to Berlin !
 Men of England, you have got to go !
 My little Red Cross Girl
 My Volunteer (he's come from his desk in the city)
 Our brave Colonials
 Sandy boy, my soldier laddy
 Sister Susie's sewing Shirts for Soldiers
 Soldier-boy
 Soldiers of the King
 The army of today's all right
 The Germans are coming, so they say
 The homes they leave behind
 The Kaiser's little walk to France
 The Red Cross nurse
 They sang 'God save our King'
 Three cheers for Little Belgium

Tommy is as good a man as any knight of old

Waltzing Willie

Watch me do the goosetstep

We didn't want a European war

We're all under the same old flag.

We're all under the same old flag.

Well done little ones, bravo Belgian boys

When An Irishman Goes Fighting

Won't you join the army?

Won't you join the army?

You made us fight you, we didn't want to do it.

You ought to join !

Your King and Country want you

But

1) they disappear in 1915

2) songs about the war are a minority of songs in the war years

3) the vast majority of songs about the war are not enthusiastic

Economic agreements

in the early days of the war (Bunley gazette november) audiences seemed to forsake places of amusement so a fifty fifty scheme was set up

this was initially negotiated between the london branch of the union and the three main music hall chains in london, but later extended (the scotsman 15 august 1914)

half the receipts went to management and the other half to the artistes in proportion to their contract salaries this lasted for three months but came up against problems due to the divergent interests of the artistes and management. To force up their half of the takings, managers would sometimes overload the programmes (since it didn't cost them more to have more artistes on) in November negotiations were held to reform the scheme, but by the beginning of 1915 it was being abandoned often unilaterally by the artistes; since box office receipts had more than fully recovered

During the whole of the war there is some reason to believe that the singers and songwriters were not always finely tuned to their audiences' desires. They tended to produce more songs about the war than were wanted, and fewer love songs. That is to say that

| Theme | Percentage of hits with this main theme (base 264 hit songs 1915 - 1918) | Percentage of full corpus with this main theme (base 921 songs 1915- 1918) |
|---------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Love | 21 | 16 |
| War/life in wartime | 17 | 25 |

Music hall stars were in demand, since their tremendous following among the working class meant that they could often have more influence in favour of the recruitment drive than could politicians, bishops, intellectuals, or other groups among the elite, in a society in which the divide between the elites and the ordinary people was incomparably greater even than it is today.

Finally, artistes and other employees of the music industry also joined the army as volunteers in considerable numbers, and would come to play a significant part in the formation of regimental concert parties and other bodies which ensured entertainment for the troops in France, in Palestine, in North Africa or elsewhere.

Music hall cannot be simply defined as a place for the expression of jingoistic patriotism, despite the denunciations of music hall on that basis made by such influential commentators as J. B. Priestley or Siegfried Sassoon. What is expressed in the music hall is the result of a compromise between numerous pressures coming from audiences, from economics and from ideology.

conclusions

Why does all this have any importance?

Well for one thing those of us who are interested in history from below, history of ordinary people have to make sure we have given sufficient importance to what mattered to ordinary people, and in many periods, popular song is a priority in people's lives.

For the period of the first world war it is particularly important to avoid casting what people did to enjoy themselves, reassure themselves and explore anxieties into the catch all category of "life on the home front" : that is to say life defined by the empire's military project as secondary to the main front. Ordinary people had many other priorities even in wartimes than winning the war.

And this conception fits into my wider perspective which I have often repeated: the faded, yellowed sheet music which survives from the war year should not be used only to "illustrate " history happening elsewhere, in grand ministerial offices or muddy trenches. Popular song is an activity which millions of people loved and insisted on finding time for : it is not an illustration of history, but part of history.